

WHEREAS; millions of Americans are affected by the hepatitis A virus (HAV), hepatitis B virus (HBV), and hepatitis C virus (HCV), all of which cause infection of the liver; and

WHEREAS; according to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, more than half of all people living with hepatitis are unaware they have it due in large part to a lack of access to preventative care, primary care, and routine screening, thereby increasing their risk for life-threatening liver disease, cancer, and unknowingly transmitting the virus to others; and

WHEREAS; practicing and accessing harm reduction strategies and services can be a successful means of preventing disease, and thanks to critical advancements in science and medicine, vaccines are available for the prevention of HAV and HBV, treatments are available for HBV and HCV, and while the body will most often naturally recover from HAV, treatments for HCV can ultimately lead to a cure; and

WHEREAS; the ongoing epidemic of opioid and other substance misuse in the state and across the country is contributing to the increased transmission of these viruses, which can spread through contact with infected blood, and the highest rates of new diseases are occurring among Black, Hispanic, and Native American populations, exacerbating existing inequities in health outcomes; and

WHEREAS; the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommends that everyone over the age of 18 should receive a screening for HBV and HCV at least once, that pregnant individuals be screened for HBV and HCV during each pregnancy, and that the most at-risk populations be screened for HBV and HCV periodically, in addition to routine vaccination against HAV and HBV for all; and

WHEREAS; on this occasion, the state of Wisconsin joins its state, local, and federal partners, along with dedicated organizations, healthcare professionals, and advocates in raising awareness of hepatitis inequities, prevention, testing, and treatment and in advocating for viral hepatitis surveillance and the treatment of all those living with chronic hepatitis;
