

WHEREAS; according to the National Institutes of Health (NIH), there are approximately 7,000 diseases and conditions that are considered rare, affecting fewer than 200,000 Americans; and

WHEREAS; while each of these diseases may affect a relatively small number of people, the NIH also states that rare diseases overall affect an estimated 25 to 30 million Americans, including many Wisconsinites; and

WHEREAS; many rare diseases are serious and debilitating conditions that have a significant impact on the lives of those affected, and while hundreds of drugs and biologics have been approved for the treatment of rare diseases according to the Food and Drug Administration, millions of Americans are still living with rare diseases for which there is no approved treatment; and

WHEREAS; individuals and families affected by rare diseases often experience problems such as diagnosis delay, difficulty finding a medical expert, lack of access to treatments or ancillary services, and difficulty affording treatments if they are available, as treatments for rare diseases are often more expensive than those for other, more common conditions; and

WHEREAS; while the public is familiar with some rare diseases, many patients and families affected by less widely known rare diseases often bear a large share of the burden of funding research and raising public awareness to support research into treatments; and

WHEREAS; today, the state of Wisconsin joins the National Organization for Rare Disorders in spreading awareness of rare diseases and supporting all affected individuals and their families in the state and across the country;
